WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

Northern California:

- The hottest temperatures of the year so far will be with us starting today and lasting through at least Tuesday. Temperatures will reach the triple digits across Northern California.
- Afternoon and evening thunderstorms are expected across the southern Sierra Nevada through the weekend.
 - Cloud to ground lightning, gusty winds, and locally heavy downpours are possible.

Southern California:

- A surge of subtropical moisture combined with daytime heating will bring the potential for isolated thunderstorms over the mountains and high deserts through this evening.
 - Gusty winds, brief heavy downpours, and flash flooding are possible.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

High risk due to Lightning late tonight through Friday night for Midcoast-Mendocino/Northwestern (NW) Mountains (Mtn) and Northeastern (NE) California (CA) and once again Saturday-Saturday night for eastern portions of NW Mtns and NE CA**

There is a little more resolution on the upcoming Monsoon Surge although confidence amounts remain varied in terms of cloud to ground lightning coverage. A shortwave wave currently found over southern CA will progress northward during the next 2 to 3 days. It will have abundant monsoon moisture with it, especially in the upper levels. There is a slight threat of lightning late tonight across the Bay Area and Mid Coast to Mendocino but a lot of that activity should be high based showers. The main threat for lightning (isolated to widely separated-mixture of wet and dry) will be found across the NW Mtn and NE CA, specifically Siskiyou and northern Trinity counties Friday afternoon and overnight. Portions of the Northern Sierra also have a thunderstorm threat Friday favoring the Tahoe Basin although storm movement would be very slow and contain more wetting cells. The shortwave will shift north and eastward on Saturday and allow for some drying although isolated to widely separated thunderstorms remain possible across NE CA and eastern portions of the NW Mtn. During this event period, other 's could experience lightning but the threat is very minimal and more high based showers is expected. Gusty outflow winds, potentially up to 50 mph, would accompany some of the thunderstorms. As a result of the above mentioned prediction, high risk due to lightning has been designated for portions of the Region.

Drier air will filter in Sunday into early next week and temperatures will remain 5 to 15 degrees above normal. The heat is not expected to abate during next week although another Monsoon moisture surge will be possible during the middle of next week. This surge looks to be brief like the near term one.

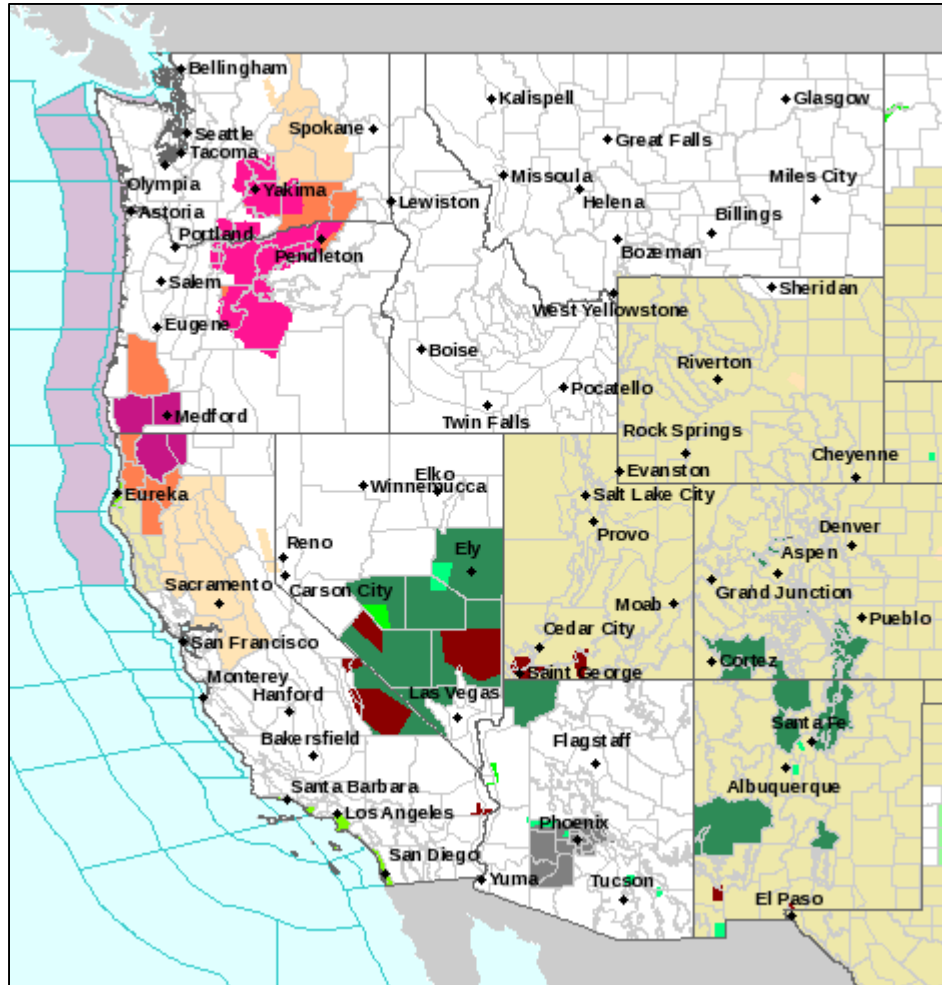

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Numerous wet thunderstorms expected over Southern California (CA) and Sierras today, fewer storms expected by the weekend**

Warm temperatures, light winds throughout the period**

Widespread convection yesterday brought locally heavy rain to a few areas near the higher terrain. The heaviest rainfall totals likely occurred in the deserts near I-15 and in the San Bernardino Mountains where local amounts were over 1" yesterday afternoon and evening. Around a half inch fell in the Sierras as well as the northern half of the Owens Valley and Inyo National Forest. Today, there will still be numerous wet thunderstorms which will redevelop before noon. Heavy rain may fall once again as the storms move westward at 15 mph or so. The focal points for the storms today may be over the Central Sierras and the eastern sections of the San Bernardino and Cleveland National Forest. No storms are expected for coastal areas from Monterey County southward to Santa Barbara County. Temperatures today and Friday will be in the mid and upper 90s in the valleys to 110 in the low desert. Friday into the weekend, a high pressure ridge is expected to become established over the central part of the state which should bring an end to the storms over Southern California. However, scattered wet storms will continue to be possible over the Sierras each afternoon. Light steering winds should keep the storms anchored to the higher elevations. Temperatures may warm to around 102 in the valleys due to less cloud cover Saturday and Sunday. Long range models show little change in the overall pattern with high pressure continuing to produce highs around 5 degrees above normal. Another surge of moisture may bring a renewed chance of thunderstorms over Southern California next Tuesday or Wednesday. Winds will be light, except near thunderstorms.
